Morning Nigel

Having discussed the use of insulation with the NHBC yesterday and what they are looking for in terms of third part assurance, they are looking for BBA accreditation, they would not accept the fire test certification you have at present as in their words it does not represent an true test of the product in all of its applications. They are claiming that it does burn as does the Kingspan K15 product and are very nervous of it being used in high rise buildings, they are currently consulting with the Fire brigade on the use of these materials.

Thank you for the email Nigel. In some other areas of the UK it has been asked for from a fire standpoint, others simply want a third party assurance. I would be interested in some feedback as to what they require and I can assist with this.

I hope your meeting goes well and I hope to hear from you soon.

Best Regards

Hi Nigel

Happy New Year to you.

I thought that there wasn't an actual BBA certificate in place at this time, I will however check with the NHBC tomorrow on what it is that prevents us from using it.

Nigel. Happy New Year and thank you for the time in speaking with me.

In terms of a BBA certificate for RS5000, this is still in testing with the BBA and should be available soon. Having said that the building regulations state that BBA requirements are required for cavity wall, timber frame type applications, but no such requirement is stated for rain screen type applications. Having said that we would be very interested in learning what the NHBC require from the BBA in terms of what assurance they require, such as fire test, which we have data for.

I did meet with Colin Laidler recently and discussed this product in detail and was not asked for this information (though we are confident we will get it soon) relating to these type applications as we are for cavity wall applications.

I hope that this helps and I will keep you updated with information on this product.

Best Regards
